word of explanation is necessary The Organization of the "Book Trust" Some years ago the publishers of the country organized what is popularly known as the "Book Trust," making a strong combination among themselves in the effort to put an end to the price-cutting on books in which this store was then a leader. This combination attempted, and up to now has succeeded, in fixing the prices for which new books should be sold. The penalty for cutting this price was to be denied the right to purchase any books at all. That is to say, if we sold, for example, "The Fighting Chance" for less than the Book Trust price-$1.08-all the publishers in the country would refuse to sell us any more books of any kind, and virtually put us out of the book business.

Getting Ready for Revolt

The Big Store is the very last establishment in the world meekly to accept such dictation as this, as regards the prices it shall ask for goods: yet there has never been a time up to now that we could see our way clear to defying this combination. We have watched with great interest the half-hearted attempts by several retailers to break away from the Book Trust control. There have been spasmodic cases of revolt, but in each case they have resulted only in the offer of a few copies under price and at the cost of reducing the value of the entire stock through limited quantities and scanty assortments resulting from the Trust's immediate retaliation.

Watching these attempts we determined that we would not ourselves raise the banner of revolt until we were absolutely assured of a success. We considered it our duty above all else to maintain a complete book stock. A premature revolt against the Book Trust meant the cutting off of the source of book supplies, leaving us with only such few books as could be picked up through indirect channels-in short, reducing our superb book stock to the condition of that of those who revolted without sufficient preparation.

Ready Now-Completely Ready

Those preparations are now complete. Patrons who come in response to this announcement will not find scanty supplies. We have plenty of the books and have so adjusted our campaign that we can promise plentiful supplies indefinitely in the future. One provision we must make-we will limit purchases whenever we deem necessary, as most of these prices are less than actual cost of the books to retailers.
